God's Philosophers is a well written introduction to medieval natural philosophy. Throughout, Hannam argues that 'science' did not emerge from nowhere with Copernicus or Galileo. Rather, there is a long history of medieval natural philosophy that predates the so-called scientific-revolution and made it possible.

God and Reason. Far from being a stagnant dark age, as the first half of the Medieval Period (500-1000 AD) certainly was, the period from 1000 to 1500 AD actually saw the most impressive flowering of scientific inquiry and discovery since the time of the ancient Greeks, far eclipsing the Roman and Hellenic Eras in every respect.

God's Philosophers by James Hannam – review. In this conspiracy, whenever someone discovered evidence of reason or progress in the 14th or 15th centuries, he writes "it could easily be labelled 'early-Renaissance' so as to preserve the negative connotations of the adjective 'medieval'.". The OED gives no dates for the medieval period,...

God's Philosophers by James Hannam – review – the Guardian

Many natural philosophers hated Ptolemy's system because it made the heavens such a muddle. The original principle of uniform motion in circles disappeared in a blizzard of geometrical constructions. This was a particular embarrassment for Jews, Christians and Muslims because they believed that God had created the world as perfect.
