Glasshouse Charles Stross

Glasshouse is a science fiction novel by British author Charles Stross, first published in 2006. The novel is set in the twenty seventh century aboard a spacecraft adrift in interstellar space. Robin, the protagonist, has recently had his memory erased.

Glasshouse (novel) - Wikipedia

Glasshouse is an intense and mindstretching mixture of hard SF and satire in a psychological puzzle centered around memory and identity. Stross writes well but in a way that is often vague, confusing, and hard to understand. The narrator describes things from the setting's (future) present day point of view with little explanation.

Glasshouse by Charles Stross - Goodreads

Charles Stross's extremely clever, if extremely loopy, "Glasshouse" imagines a far future of travel by teleportation (through assembler gates--wait for it), body alterations, physical backups, and a worm that reprograms people's memories. The hero is (a male) named Robin who's just gone through memory erasure (perhaps voluntarily).

Perhaps we all live in a Glasshouse of our own making, Stross constantly hints, while offering up an account of those who, contrary to the old adage, respond by throwing as many stones as possible.

Glasshouse by Charles Stross

Charles Stross is an ideas man, and he's really in his element with Glasshouse. The character interactions are still weak, but the book was so well paced and so full of ideas that I did not notice.* Providing a standard time and identity authentication being the core roles of governments.* Weapons powered by wormholes leading to a secret star.*
